Author: camise The United States Food and Drug Administration (FDA) has officially warned against the use of ayurvedic and traditional medicinal herbs to treat yeast infection and candidiasis due to the lack of available clinical data. The FDA released a revised draft guidance in 2010 which stated that herbs could be used to treat bacterial infections but not fungal infections including yeast infections. However, on October 28, 2016, the FDA issued a warning against the use of herbs to treat fungal infections. The revised guidance cited that clinical data was lacking for herbal preparations in the treatment of candidiasis and other common types of infections. The FDA also noted that herbs often contain elements that can be toxic in high enough doses and that for this reason any herbal products that are not manufactured in the US or other countries following Good Manufacturing Practices (GMPs) should be avoided. According to the statement, although some studies have indicated that certain herbs may be used in combination with or without other medication to treat fungal infections, they were not found to be effective against candidiasis. The FDA noted that it could not recommend the use of any herbs with the exception of the sedative valerian for the treatment of candidiasis as there is no safe and effective treatment.
