As it so happened, my aunt shared with me the story of how my grandfather, my great grandfather, and my great grandmother got their nickname. They had all just settled in Texas. My grandfather was a surveyor, and after getting settled and before being licensed as a surveyor, he joined the army. It was from the army, that he got the nickname, "John Will". The reason why he was joined in the army was to provide for his family. Somehow he ended up serving in Tennessee. His dad felt that since he was in Tennessee for a long period of time, he was fair game for any bully. It ended up that he was teased a bit and people called him John Will. A few years later, when he was called to complete his military service, he left to join the fighting at the Civil War. If he had not volunteered to join the army, I wouldn't be here today, so he was able to secure his family's freedom with his service. He was with the Union soldiers and was promoted to officer. One day, when he was at the end of his service, he was getting a free pass from the commander of the hospital where he was stationed. The commander gave him his pass to take home with him

What's New In?

On Wednesday, the European Union announced a new emissions trading scheme, called the Emissions Trading System (ETS), that will extend the existing EU carbon market to reduce the risks of future climate change. This means that it may become easier for investors to buy and sell carbon credits in order to comply with their own climate policies. More than 1,600 companies registered to take part in the new carbon scheme, and, according to the EU, at least 20% of EU emissions will come from trade by 2020. With the new plan, investors will be able to buy the right to emit a specific amount of carbon dioxide (CO<sub>2</sub>) in the future, by investing in emissions-intensive projects at the moment. The first phase of the program will run from 2010 to 2021 and is designed to reduce CO<sub>2</sub> emissions by 6.5% in the EU. It is expected to reduce harmful emissions by at least 23 million tonnes a year. The second phase of the scheme will run from 2021 to 2027 and is planned to reduce CO<sub>2</sub> emissions by 30% in the EU, accounting for at least 16.7 million tonnes a year by 2027. How Does the New Emissions Trading Scheme Work? The new emissions trading scheme will work by companies having to purchase permits to emit a specific amount of CO<sub>2</sub>. From then on, companies that create more CO<sub>2</sub> will need to buy more permits from companies that produce less CO<sub>2</sub>. This will encourage firms to reduce emissions and limit the amount of CO<sub>2</sub> they produce. Companies having too many permits will be forced to surrender some of their permits to companies that have too few. The trading will be done according to a "cap-and-trade" system. This means that the EU has set a cap on the amount of CO<sub>2</sub> that can be emitted by businesses in the entire EU by the end of 2027. Companies will then produce as much CO<sub>2</sub> as they can while still being within the cap. This means that companies will need to buy permits for the emissions they produce over the next few years to allow them to meet the cap set by the EU. Investors will have more options to buy permits as the scheme develops. However, they will need to follow certain guidelines to maximize the returns they make. Buying Carbon Permits on a Secure Platform The EU says that investors will be able to buy CO<sub>2</sub> permits from the government and guarantee that the carbon credits are safe and secure. They will also be able to trade
