Lionel Messi will return to training next week after a two-month lay-off and Barcelona will be without the forward for the match against Betis, as well as the rest of La Liga's first weekend, on the 21 and 22 January, due to the international break. Gerard Piqué said on Monday that Messi had undergone tests after a hamstring injury he sustained against Sevilla in the first half of the European Super Cup on August 8. Barcelona now hope the 27-year-old, who has been rested for the Copa del Rey final against Sevilla on December 2, can be back for the second leg against Atletico Madrid in the last 16 on January 18. "There's no problem with his injury," Piqué said. "It will be up to him to decide when he's ready to play again. If he doesn't play in the Super Cup he will play in the league, without a doubt." The lack of clarity over whether Messi will play in the Super Cup for Barcelona has raised eyebrows in some quarters, given that he had not missed a competitive fixture for two years, since the final of the Club World Cup in 2014. With Barcelona suffering a drubbing by the European champions, Chelsea, in the second leg of their semi-final last week, the question of what exactly is the Testimonial Cup, or the club's equivalent of the annual players' match, has also been raised. The Super Cup is Barcelona's version of the testimonial match, but it is not widely supported by the team's current players. The annual game between the side's youth team and the first team for a winner, which was held in October 2012, is considered less important, although it is a tradition that will be honoured this year. "I don't think it's right for players to ask to play in that game," Piqué said. "They already have their own testimonial. That's enough. It's about marking the 20th anniversary of the club. "All the players who played for Barcelona before the last 20 years played in the first team. I'm not saying that is bad, but it's only about remembering all the players who have played for this club. That's enough." Barcelona will now travel to La Rosaleda to begin pre-season training on
