a "Dropbox for the rest of us." Microsoft made a deal with Dropbox this year to use its tech to store your files in the cloud.

"With Windows Live SkyDrive, it was just the cloud storage, and I'm sure that many people downloaded the apps but did not check out the cloud storage. With Office Online, we realized we can take a product that customers already use and make it even better and more robust, and let them explore what the cloud can do for them and what the cloud can do for their businesses," explained Microsoft's Corporate Vice President of Windows Live Jeremy Toeman in a press conference.

Instead of just being another cloud storage service like DropBox, Microsoft's Windows Live OneDrive service will offer many more features, like file versioning, OneDrive integration with Office and Windows apps, and many more security features.

Toeman's comments are at odds with Microsoft's recent statements that it was abandoning the cloud and that the future of Microsoft would be in the on-premise, enterprise market. OneDrive will be completely free for consumers. Apps for customers using Windows 8, Windows RT, Windows Phone and other Microsoft products will be available on Windows Store, the same as for users of the iCloud app. OneDrive also has a file-hosting service called SharePoint that users can get to from an address like The SharePoint service will be free for individuals. SharePoint-based apps will be available on the Windows Store. Microsoft also announced a slew of new features in Office Online for Office for Mac 2011 that have made it to Office for PC. Customers will have more features available when using Office Online, including: In the coming weeks, Microsoft will increase the storage space available to individual users, and the company will also increase the storage available to Office 365 subscribers. Customers will also be able to upload files up to 4GB in size. Microsoft is also beta testing 0cc13bf012
