in this case the client is the web service client generator tool. however, axis 2 is not limited to this - it can also be used as a webservice client that can be accessed by other tools and application software using services. for example you can use axis 2 as a webservice client without generation of the webservice client program. then we create a wsdl2java program. the java web service api (jws api) is a low-level set of interfaces that allow you to access web services functionality via j2ee web-oriented apis. this tutorial will demonstrate how to use the jws api to access a web service using apache axis2. i am going to use the axis2 wsdl2java tutorial to create a java client. it works like a charm, but there are some problems when i use it on another computer. thats why i will use axis2 wsdl2java. when you download axis2 wsdl2java, you will find a.jar file and a.bat file, so you need to combine those files. the wsdl2java tool is available on the apache axis website. after downloading it, extract the downloaded archive into a folder. then open the "axis2-maven-tools.jar" file that you extracted using a zip extractor tool. in the newly created folder, there will be a "wsdl2java.bat" file. execute the "wsdl2java.bat" file. it will generate a "helloworldservice.java" file and a "helloworldservice.class" file. i use the "update-user.bat" to generate the "helloworldservice.class" file automatically. open the "helloworldservice.class" file using the default text editor. you will see the following code. right-click on the code editor tab and choose "source" -> "generate from selection". it will open a small dialog to generate a new file. click on the "ok". the new "helloworldservice.java" file and the "helloworldservice.class" file will automatically be added to the current project.
